Course Description

This course presents U.S. history from a chronological perspective, beginning with pre-Columbian era and ending with Reconstruction. It also addresses geographic, social, political, economic, and multicultural factors that have shaped our unique American character.

The course has four major goals: to provide students with sufficient background knowledge from an economic, political, and social perspective in order to prepare them for honors level high school social studies; to prepare students to participate in American society and government and advocate for social justice; and to facilitate students' acquisition of skills needed to think critically and become lifelong learners; and to improve honors students' research skills to encourage independent thinking.

Instruction emphasizes the development of higher order thinking, analysis and writing as well as building a firm foundation of usable data to interpret current events through the use of technology and primary sources.
